Staters seek election in whistle stop tour

By Peter Fontaine
Staters Union

On the Federalist side, the Whistle Stop Tour was a fast-paced burst of a lot of information. Many of the candidates were heavily focused on the education crisis, but only some of them came up with a viable ways of funding such a large project.

Some suggested a prison reform that would have non-violent offenders work labor jobs for free, freeing up money through the labor and by not having to pay to keep prisoners in the prisons.

One Stater even proposed legalizing prostitution and marijuana. This would include the government regulating and taxing them heavily to create a lot of revenue.

One of the suggestions which would allow for the largest budget, though, was to lower the amount of insurance fraud, saving around $50 billion. This money would be put both into diminishing debt and other improvements such as education.

In the end, the candidates that won presented their points specifically and didn't generalize in their solutions to problems. Honesty also played a large factor in many Staters' decisions.

The candidates for the Nationalist Party spoke on many topics. Chief among these were education reform, welfare reform, and the legalization of marijuana.

Governor hopeful, Patrick Bircher, had this to say, "The welfare program in Kansas is in shambles, however, the current system and current legislature have the opportunity to be extremely successful."

The Nationalist candidate for Commissioner of Insurance, Adam Kropf, believes he has a plan to pay for our schools, "We could raise money from taxes on insurance to fund education."

On the marijuana side of things, Attorney General candidate, Hunter Eisler, said this, "I believe in the decriminalization of marijuana, and, I would like to set up a state operated recovery plan for people suffering from addiction."

As a whole, the Nationalist Party touched on the topics that were expected of them, being the more liberal party.

Who is the best county?

By Malachi Hibler
Staters Union

Which county seems to be the best? That question is very debatable because each county provides a distinct quality about their county.

All counties refer to themselves as “the best”, but the ultimate decision is who is the best county? I myself happen to believe that King County is by far the best county.

King County provides a solid brotherhood to each stater and also the name of the county says enough itself.

Other counties seem to match up to King County’s perspective, but no other county has yet proven to be considered to match up to King County.

why they are superior to other seven counties. As a result, each county is unique in their own way, but King County is the county that separates itself from the others.
